

Civil society organisations of Cameroon agree that proper implementation of Security Council Resolution 1325 is critical for the success of the SDGs. Participation at every level, including women, indigenous peoples, and those in every other marginalised groups must be pursued and achieved by the government. Protection of rights, and securing genuine access to education must include recognition that hundreds of thousands of children are out of school due to conflict and gender-based violence. Government must mobilise resources to support the actions of civil society organisations and spread action and information across the whole country. Capacity building for rural women and indigenous people is necessary, to increase resilience and support adaptation to climate change. This must also be safeguarded in the reality of conflict and internally displaced persons must not be left out of the equation. Collection and analysis of gender disaggregated data is critical to securing human rights in Cameroon.
